AUTUMN PLOWING.

There is no operation on the farm that is more controlled in its results by eircumstances than plowing in autumn for spring crops. Our experience for many years past, on a heavy soil, has been rather unfavorable. It is often recommended as tending to affect the pulverization of such soils by the crumbling power of frost. More frequently we mass. Stubble or sward, for example, if left untouched, is kept loose and porous to a certain degree by the small roots which fill it. Plowing has a tendency to break up this porous nature, and when the late autumn rains full upon it, or melting snows sonk into it, they frequently form a sort of mortar, which ultinuately becomes a hard mass. This result is controlled in some degree by the quantity of water which comes upon it, as well as by thorough underdraining, but we have had clayer lands, which had been well tilled, nearly spoiled for the time by abundant winter rains. During the present season, we bave been afforded additional proof against autumn plowing, in a corn field, a rirt of which was plowed late last year, and a part a short time before the planting season. All through the summer the fall-plowed ground was hard, and could be scarcely made mellow; the spring-plowed land was in good. well pulverized condition, and gave much the best corn. On lighter and more porous soils this unfavorable result would not be so likely to take place, and a dry autumn and wlater would fish nicely browned? tend to prevent the evil effects. On the whole, we would advise cantion, and filed be frequently turned. testing both ways by a trial of each,

Aside from the practical use of Iraves a due regard to appearances should prompt us to gather them up from our doorvards and lawns, and put them in some place where they will not lie around loosely. Dame Nature ought to have an attic in which to put away her cast-off clothing and not let the auturn winds acatter them broadcast; but she prefers that we should do her house-cleaning for her, and so we should attend to it directly and reap the beneats of our labors in another season. Pile them in one corner of the yard if there is no cow or horse to use them, Cover them with a layor of earth and turn all the house slops upon them; and another spring you will have a good supply of fertilizing material for your flower garden. Gunasing Wagons.-But few people are aware that they do wagons an I Economy of comfort in the winter care of farm stock, I will state what a long and close observation in wintering dairy cows has developed. A half century or more ago, the farmers of New York were less careful of their animals than they are now. It was no uncommon occurrence then for farmers to let their cattle run all winter with no other protection than a board fence or an open shed at the side of the yard, and when they did so, it cost according to size, two and one-half to two and three-quarter tons of hay to winter a cony averaging for twenty-six weeks twonty-seven to thirty pounds of hay per day.
